Introduction ===== For a successful laparoscopic resection of a duodenal tumour, a large working space and clear vision of the operative field are critical to guarantee a safe margin to the tumour. In this article, we describe a novel technique to achieve a stable and large working space without using any additional tool and to improve the visualization of the operative field during laparoscopy. Methods ===== During laparoscopy, a 12-mm-sized, round, extra-lightweight polyurethane cone (Figure 1)(ref-type="fig") was placed on the diaphragm of the abdominal wall, around which the camera tip was inserted. The cone was passed through the abdominal wall with either a nylon thread or sutures. To confirm the correct position of the cone, the threaded cone was fixed to the diaphragm with a suture and the remaining cone was fixed to the abdominal wall with a suture. The camera tip was introduced into the cone and the laparoscope was attached to the tip. The tip of the cone with the laparoscope was then pulled out of the body to the right of the patient. This cone was then fixed to the other side of the patient with an additional suture. These steps were repeated again for the other side of the patient. All sutures were then removed and the abdominal wall and cone were inspected to ensure the correct placement of the cone and a laparoscopic view. The cone was then fixed with a suture to the abdominal wall and the laparoscope was placed into the cone. The cone was then attached to the patient's skin with a suture, and the remaining cone was fixed to the other side of the abdominal wall with a suture. After that, with the patient in the right-side-up position and under an operating table with one leg lifted, the cone was pulled out of the body and fixed to the other side of the patient. The laparoscopic equipment was then placed on the cone and the cone was fixed to the surrounding organs with a suture to ensure a stable and large working space.
