There are two ways to look at this. The results in Figure 3{ref-type="fig"} suggest that for the higher levels of malaria transmission (year 1, 2, 3) the results converge with the USA-returns perspective. However, as the transmission measure is reduced the results suggest that the USA-returns perspective is not as robust as the actual USA-returns, implying that the USA-returns are mis-specified. This is possible because the probability of getting malaria is known to be high in the USA and therefore if there was a more substantial rate of returning cases to the USA rather than a reduction in the probability of US-returns then there would be a larger gap between the actual USA-returns and the USA-returns from the USA-only perspective. Summary {#sec9} ===== The inference of the incidence of infectious diseases requires an adequate understanding of the relationship between incidence of infections in the source country and incidence in the destination country. This is a challenge for malaria, and the modelling results suggest that the USA-returns are likely to under-predict the actual number of imported malaria cases. The first objective of this paper was to review the evidence for recent origin of imported cases of malaria to the USA. The first finding is that most of the evidence that shows there are recent origin of imported cases is coming from retrospective analyses of data on imported cases. However, the results of recent meta-analyses, which use newer surveillance systems, find a low prevalence of recent origin. The second finding is that there are two ways to look at the underlying system that determines whether the USA-returns are likely to be a robust indicator of the actual number of imported cases. The USA-only perspective is intuitive as it assumes that the probability of being imported is directly proportional to the probability of travelling to the source country. However, the USA-return perspective is also valid, and depending on the surveillance system in the destination country, the latter may over-estimate the number of imported cases because it assumes that the incidence of malaria in the US-bound traveller is higher than it is in the traveller who does not travel to the US.
