Monday, November 28, 2015 I wish I could say that I'd see this as an opportunity for a second lease on life, but unfortunately life doesn't work like that. I can do so much for the world. People need my expertise with social media, my expertise with technology, my expertise with international law, my expertise with my field of expertise, my expertise with my field of expertise. And that's where I feel the most lost. I always know I should step up and do more. But I don't know who I am. I am Dr. Lauren Scaldaferri, and I'm a professional. I'm not a very good one. So I write. I do that. I read, I enjoy, I learn. I've built a brand. I think. I used to excel in my field. I'm competent. I excel at what I do. But that was then. What can I say? I'm not looking for pity. At least not anymore. But there are people out there who are sad. They are people who have lost a loved one and are trying to figure out the world. Their hearts are heavy, and they miss their loved one. They wonder how things could have gone wrong, and if it was their fault. They don't understand why they, themselves, have to suffer along with the survivor. And that's exactly what I wish I was, a survivor. It's not something to pat myself on the back for. It's something to be thankful for. And while I'll never love the way I did my husband, I will love him more than I could have ever loved anyone else. And that's a huge consolation. I don
