Hydrolysis results in the cleavage of a phosphoryl group yielding inorganic phosphate and a substituted alcohol. The family of hydrolases includes phosphatases, phospholipases, lipases, esterases, and proteinases. The proteinase family includes pepsin, chymotrypsin, cathepsin, and trypsin. Enzymes within the proteinase family are involved in a variety of cellular processes. For example, they catalyze the breakdown of proteins in the nervous and muscular systems of an animal to allow healing and to aid in regeneration. Proteinases also act as regulators in the blood coagulation cascade to control bleeding. Proteinases further act as the major digestive proteinases in humans. They play a role in the digestion of the dietary protein that forms part of the feces. Additionally, proteinases act in the activation of blood clotting cascade and the release of digestive enzymes from the pancreas for digestion of carbohydrates and protein. Proteinases are used in the medical field to accelerate wound healing. For example, the use of purified bovine pancreatic elastase in wound dressings has proven to accelerate the rate at which
